Not illustrated. 1880 Excerpt: ...lying by the shore: First, one who on his large proportions bore The stamp of heathen warrior; where he lay, Harmless and helpless in his disarray, The mild autumnal cheer was clouded oer By uncouth shades which haunt him evermore, Dark horrors of his harsh rule past away. Then a fair lady, barbarously slain: O stately pleasantness, untimely cold! There might one grieve till sad night should enfold The appealing form; and gaze, and gaze again, As though through longing one might yet behold The vanished life. Ah, longing all in vain! SONNET. If I and mine were all below the grass Beside that old and solemn Church you know, Would you forget us? Nay! in fitful show Fair early friendships through lone memory pass, Like sunny glimpses caught in a cold glass. And there, serenely sheltered, come and go The undying dead; ay, better sheltered so Than under sepulchres of stone and brass. But for the rest, whose mortal hands to-day Might clasp your own as warmly as before, To whom your voice, your looks, might now convey The joy Time crowns with pathos, and restore The strength of trust in absence worn away,--Let these, through memory, mutely plead for more. MAURICE CLIFTON. PART I. Scene, Clifton Park. Time, Evening. Speaker, Maurice. Hearer, Dick, his Friend. Hi! hi! come along, Dick, and see the West Gate; Im going there now, and I dont mean to wait. My uncle, is that? If it is, I shall bolt. Its not. Well, then, look to your right. Thats the Holt. Her aunt took the place about two months ago--In June. It belongs to my uncle, you know. You see it? those chimneys behind the Scotch firs; And one little window--I fancy that hers. O, Dick, Ive no words to describe her! And she Mewed up there, and snubbed, and tormented for me! Break off our engagement we certainl...
