

THE CHARITABLE SMOKER

Bright red colour, flickered from a stick of cigarette he gently smoked. Ash followed ash in the same direction, making a fine sprinkle on the sandy ground. His slim body, well tucked into the chair. He was calm. I didnt know if he was thinking. His head was up, starring at the cloud of smoke above. The confidence he exuded struck me in successive sequence. I liked the very way he smoked. Especially the way he used his tongue to curl smoke out of his mouth. What an art, I thought. And for the first time in my life, I felt like smoking. His shoes were new. Polished as well. What of his trousers? Oh! Crispy! Very neat! Just fascinating. I liked him very much going by his composure. Directly behind him stood a four storey building in which people were streaming into. People that from vantage position, I beheld that poverty had very well finished with them. Torn trousers, unkempt hair, I saw in numbers. It was also not hard to notice that some of them had never known what bathing water felt like for months. On their faces were however, fading frustration and hopelessness with glimmer of hope in fine medley. On the building was a bold inscription -THE TAMALE FOUNDATION. It brought my curiosity. Then I walked past the gentle smoker into the building. This is the Tamale Foundation, said a man to me as I queried him to know more. Havent you heard about it? He further said to me, his eyes widened in surprise that surged into it. No, I said. The man laughed at my ignorance. What is it for? I further asked. It is for the poor. This is the centre for the banishment of poverty. He laughed again. Poverty? I said, as if that was my first time of hearing that word. Then I paused to ponder. I saw smiles being put on peoples faces during my reverie. Folks were being given springboards to start dreaming. Where are you? I thundered on leaving the world of my reverie because the man who spoke with me earlier on was no longer with me. And I had more questions begging for answers. Whose brain-child is this? Again I asked on top of my voice, desperate to hear somebody talk back. Hands touched my shoulders from behind. When I turned, it was the gentle smoker that stood. An inviting smile stood on his face. What do you want, gentleman of the press? He asked me, slowly offered his right hand, and we shook hands. My name is Tamale. I own this place. Can we be of any help to you? The word, help, is what we exist for. His calm mien and confidence were nothing else but striking. For some seconds, I couldnt find words to utter, as if my sense of mission had flown away. A feeling of honour arose inside me afterwards. Not because of Tamales charm, but for the chance to file a story I believed it would be a hot one. My name is Ken, freelance writer, was my terse response. Feel relaxed, said Tamale, offering me a stick of cigarette, but I declined. When asked how he got the foundation started, Tamale took five steps away from me, sat on a settee, gesturing me to join him. I did with all pleasure. Curiosity just drove me on. This is the realization of a dream I nurtured since I was a youth, which never came on a platter of gold. Tamales story began. There is no dream pushing towards reality that does not duel with obstacles, he went further to say. The most difficult times, I believe, prevail when you are very close to the object of your hearts chase. Tamale lit up another cigarette, drew a deep breath and went ahead. YOU DONT WANT TO STOP READING THIS STORY NOW!
