This fleet at first proceeded with much order, and was ranged in several lines: but when the ships of the Greeks met its attack, those of the Persians ran foul of each other; confusion ensued; the fleet was defeated, and part of it sunk. The two fleets occupy, perhaps, more space in my plan than they did in the sea where they fought; but the smallness of the scale has obliged me to represent the ships much larger than they were, and consequently to extend the fleets considerably more. I am of opinion that the fleet of the Greeks was drawn 01 Pausan. lib. 1. cap. I. p. 3. Herodot. lib. 8. cap. 82. Plutarch, in Themist. t. r. p. 119. I have dispersed several small bodies of Grecian troops in the isle of Salamis, because the coasts of that island were guarded by heavy-armed soldiers. The throne of Xerxes was on Mount iEgaleus; and I have placed near that prince a great part of his army; because it appears that he had great numbers round him, since, in fact, otherwise he would have been exposed to the insults of the Greeks. I have also placed some troops near Eleusis, and others on the road, because in the night before the battle they had received orders to march towards Peloponnesus.1 The fourth plan is that of the battle of Plataea. Though I have obtained no additional notices with respect to the country...
