Not illustrated. 1895 Excerpt: ...Tower. In the front is the Mount, or Keep, clothed from its base to its summit with trees and shrubs. The top of the mount is crowned with towers and battlements, in the centre of which is a gateway closed by an iron grating. The light breaking through this relieves the heaviness of the battlements and produces a charming effect. On the right appear two unfinished towers, one of which is the Bear Tower, begun by Richard III., and at the extreme termination is the lofty and commanding Guys Tower--the whole range being joined by ramparts and embattled walls of amazing thickness. Open flights of steps and broad walks on the top of the walls form a means of communication through the whole of the fortress. The scene is grand, and so perfect the fascination that it would be difficult to say what might be added that would improve, or what might be taken away that would not injure, the effect of the whole. Visitors are admitted by tickets, which are procured at the Lodge gate for one shilling, and give you the privilege of wandering through the grounds and apartments open for inspection. You are first admitted into the great hall, in which I found on my entrance quite a number of people, nearly all Americans, and a most persistent and inquisitive lot they were. There were two attendants, each taking about a dozen people through at a time. While this lot was passed on, those remaining amused themselves by inspecting the various objects of interest in the hall, the attendant explaining and answering the numerous questions put--many of them very silly and some quite amusing. It struck me that I would not like to be a chaperon at the Castle. There are a number of the relics of that mythical hero, Guy, Earl of Warwick, kept in the hall--the sword, shield, helmet, breas...
