Not illustrated. 1861 Excerpt: ...volumes of the Bolandist lives of the saints, and the new edition of the Byzantine historians, and the Slate Trials, and the Encyclopedia Britannica, and Moreri, and the Statutes at large, and the Gentlemans Magazine from the beginning, each separately, and in succession? Such a course of reading would certainly do a good deal towards weakening the mind, if it did not create absolute insanity. But in all these we have named, even in the statutes at large, and in thousands upon thousands of other books, there is precious honey to be gathered by the literary busy bee, who passes on from flower to flower. In fact, a course of reading, as it is sometimes called, is a course of regimen for dwarfing the mind, like the drugs which dog-breeders give to King Charles spaniels to keep them small. Within the span of life allotted to man there is but a certain number of books that it is practicable to read through, and it is not possible to make a solection that will not, in a manner, wall in the mind from a free expansion over the republic of letters. The being chained, as it were, to one intellect in the perusal straight on of any large book is a sort of mental slavery superinducing imbecility. Even Gibbons Decline and Fall, luminous and comprehensive as its philosophy is, and rapid and brilliant the narrative, will become deleterious mental food if consumed straight through without variety. It will be well to relieve it occasionally with a little Bostons Fourfold State, or Harveys Meditations, or Sturms Reflections for Every Day in the Year, or Don Juan, or Wards History of Stoke upon-Trent Now while it is quite true that collectors do not in general read their books successively straight through, the practice of desultory reading, as it is
